Early in the morning, when Everett looked out of the diamondpaned window of his bedroom, he saw that the trees and vines in the garden were dripping. The nightwind had beaten off many of the leaves, which had grown yellow in the long drought and the dying summer. The distant bluffs were hidden behind a curtain of mist. Two village mothers passed, their shawls drawn over their heads and their feet dragging slowly in their clumsy, wooden shoes. Everett dressed quickly, for his room was dark, and the silence of the village oppressed him. When he went out to his breakfast in the long, bare dining-room, Mother Werther served him in silence. He wondered at her unusual taciturnity, and he tried to start a cheerful conversation. She replied to him in monosyllables. The entrance of a boy whom he remembered seeing at the learning-school temporarily diverted Mother Werther from her unpleasant thoughts. This is my son Johann, she said, pushing the lad forward. The boy hung his head, and Everett inquired why Johann was never at home. It is not wise that he should be kept at the gasthaus, Mother Werther explained, as she fixed a place for Johann at the distant end of the table. Does some unusual occurrence bring him here today Everett inquired, with a show of interest. It is the Day of Warning, and families hold communion before they go to the meeting-house,...
