When the shops are running, one of the students has charge of the engine and another of the boilers. Drawing.--The object of the course in drawing is to enable the student to express his ideas clearly on paper. With this in view, he is first taught to use drawing instruments; next, to make working drawings of objects that exist, and then to put his own designs on paper in such a way that they will be intelligible to others. This course goes hand in hand with the theoretical and practical part of the instruction in engineering. In the lecture-room, the student is taught to shape his ideas into practical forms, in the drawing room, to put them on paper, and in the shops, to make them into material forms. The first term of the first year is devoted to freehand sketching, and the remainder to practice in the use of drawing instruments and short course of elementary perspective. The instruction in the second year consists of a course of orthographic projections, and making working drawings of a casting or of some simple form of machine. In the third year, the work consists of the solution of various problems of mechanism, such as gearing, valves for the steam engine, and the like, and making a complete set of working drawings of some...
