A flower and not a flower; of mist yet not of mist; at midnight she was there; she went as daylight shone. She came for a little while was like a dream of spring, and then, as morning clouds that vanish traceless, she was gone. Gwong-Jau (Canton), China, July 1834: wealthy British-Sicilian opium smuggler Charles Paul Sansovino (28 years) falls for exquisite, snake tattooed Chinese boat-girl Yin Hsueh-yen (17 years): attractive to men, she makes money that way, keeps life because of her looks. But who exactly is she, what secrets hidden in her almond eyes, disfigurement and scars; would her life be best without him? Written by Charles as a retrospective journal, the story of the White Poppy, opium whore, is an exquisite and erotic story of forbidden love and lust, taboo, set in the Victorian Opium Wars with China. It is about two strangers who shouldn't fall in love but do. Canton, forest of houseboats along the River Pearl, edge of the South China Sea: in spring plum blossom falls there like snow, wind-scattered poppy petals blowing along the forest lanes of gaudy red and green, where red paper lanterns of brothels turn the sky crimson. In Imperial China every woman belongs to a man: the birth of a boy is most important, celebrated with joy, while a girl gives one more to whore. Raped by her father at nine years, sold into sex, White Poppy's life turns to pain. White Poppy: named after the opium poppy (Papaver somniferum) of the Chinese opium trade, from Calcutta, India. One whore amongst ten thousand, corruption, manipulated money and...
