The parts A and B (Fig. 185) are completely independent of the parts C and D of the switchboard; but in these two latter parts there are five systems, each forming a complete and distinct whole, quite independent of the others. Each system comprises one of the annunciators of C, the two plugs which are nearest to this annunciator, the two contact keys immediately in front, and the single contact key behind and between them. 153. In order to explain the operation of a switchboard of fifty subscribers, we will take any two subscribers wishing to communicate with one another. Let w , and s (Fig. 188) be the subscribers lines, m , and n their respective switchholes, m , n the coils of the corresponding annunciators, a any one of the annunciators in part C, c and d the plugs resting in front of this annunciator, and b , e and f the contact keys belonging to this system; T is the telephone belonging to the switchboard, g a battery for ringing up the subscribers. Key b is, therefore, the telephone key; the others are for calling. It is easy to follow the path of the current for each position of the movable pieces. Let us suppose m_3 to have sent a current. Disc m falls, the central station places the plug c into the plug-hole mv At this moment all communication of the subscriber m_3 with the central station is interrupted, but...
